Background

COVID-19 is a defining global crisis of our time – disrupting and transforming our world with profound consequences for governments, institutions, cities, communities, families and individuals. COVID-19 and its containment measures have negatively impacted the social, economic, and environmental domains of sustainable development and are threatening to reverse progress on the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development and its 17 Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). COVID-19 is a reminder that human health and social protection are inextricably connected to planetary, economic, and societal health. COVID-19 has added urgency to the implementation of the principle of LNOB. The pandemic's severe socio-economic impacts call for an integrated approach to LNOB through multisector initiatives. The importance of the principle is recognized by the 2019-2020 VNR countries although comprehensive approaches to LNOB remain limited. To accelerate progress on SDG mainstreaming, all levels of government need to step up their multidimensional, systemic and gender-responsive integrated policy solutions. At the same time social protection is an essential COVID-19 related response with over 1400 new social protection measures introduced since 2020. However vulnerable people are increasingly not able to access many of these social protection measures. The disruption caused by COVID-19 has been transformative, demonstrating how rapidly economic and social behaviours can change, providing a glimpse of what a better world might look like and offering a window of opportunity to shape the future of sustainable development. In this session we will present and discuss innovative ways on how governments have and can take action to reduce the COVID burden, while aiming at inclusive sustainable development.
